This Savaria Eclipse home elevator is equipped with a geared traction drive system providing a smooth and quiet full automatic operation with a 1,000-pound capacity. Showcasing millwork integration, this desk area in the den features wood grain millwork with aluminum finger pulls amidst oak hardwoods and fir baseboards. An onyx and bronze wall sconce continues the theme of natural elements.

The superbly crafted staircase feature stainless steel stand-offs, 12-ml. glass inserts, and solid white oak Eastern stringers with a white oak, round railing.

love the dropped and sloped ceilings that achieve room definition while sustaining saturation of natural light throughout each space.”

The homeowners also did not compromise on architectural integrity with a design by Croy D. Yee Architects. “The design was generated by the clients needs and the lot itself, which is shaped like a trapezoid and wider at the front,” explains Croy of the eye-catching façade that was influenced by the forms and massing generated from the site factors. “We drew upon the client’s Scandinavian background and affinity for natural materials. Sloped rooflines are common in the Netherlands and we wanted to harvest a lot of daylight, adding a skylight over the main staircase and using wood slat dividers, not walls, that would filter light to other areas.”

Evident from the exterior, the design emphasizes common areas with the main level exhibiting contrasting ceiling heights with sloped ceilings. “The design consists of three masses,” describes Croy. “On the west side we have the garage with a mezzanine level and a master bedroom mass behind in a lower, flat-roofed area that faces south. On the east side is a rectangular form that contains the living room, den, and ding areas—a continuous core that allows light from the generous south-facing windows to penetrate the space. We had a great project team so there is continuity from the landscaping to the décor that is all sympathetic with the exterior.”

Desiring to age in place, a main level with owner’s suite, a light-infused walkout, and the full-length mezzanine atop of the garage all enjoy elevator access with a future-proof sensibility. Practical, yet ultimately functional, family gatherings were further a priority as it was designed for what they hoped, over the years, to achieve.
